

Introrse: The Kings Whisper

This is the second novel in the Introrse Sci-Fi trilogy. The first novel is Introrse: Where the Spirits Speak. The first two books set on the planet Hytrae can stand alone. Everything seems to be occurring on Hytrae pretty much as it has for generations until Soroff Baejon discovers what he believes to be resurrection technology. He convinces himself with a truth from an ancient religion that man is appointed to die only once. Soroff convinces most of Hytrae he has indeed found the secret to immortality by raising his assassinated emperor from the dead. He offers to raise all Hytraens worthy into immortality. All that is required to enter a resurrection chamber is trust. As Soroff hopes political boundaries lose their significance without the nastiness of a global war. He regretfully discovers the boundary between the spiritual and physical world is breached by his technology. Some very nasty immortals who've been busy scavenging iniquities spirits almost since Hytrae's beginning now have direct access to the people of Hytrae. For Soroff's benefit they destroy two cities. But the nastiest have not yet arrived. The prophet Etue Shuni of the Cepshire realizes Baejon's actions have set in motion Hytrae's apocalypse. She doesn't have long. A Cepshire prophecy of an end-time king who will maximize the salvation of souls must now be fulfilled. Doyen Nytrez, a young man with little enthusiasm for anything except fishing the migrating ocean finds himself literally waking up from death as the prophesied king. With the aid of two very large Veriwarriors he makes his way to the prophet to be anointed king. Along the way finds love at the bottom of a subterranean lake in the city of Tri Calc Kni where the attractive Tela Nolo rules the largest smuggling ring on Hytrae. How much is fiction? Not all of it. Visit Introrse.org
