Not illustrated. 1905 edition. Excerpt: ... chapter xx History of the Chrysanthemum The early history of the Chrysanthemum collected and compiled by Professor F. W. Burbidge of Dublin, is recognized as the most concise and correct treatise on the subject known. From this work the following is condensed: Of all flowers, that which has been said to represent cheerfulness under adversity--the Chrysanthemum, or Golden Flower of the Greek--may fairly be called the Queen of Autumn. Six varieties were described by Breynius as being cultivated in Holland two centuries ago. Originally introduced to England from the Celestial Empire in 1754, it seems first to have been cultivated by that celebrated gardener, Miller of Chelsea, but was soon afterward lost by some unfortunate accident. Again introduced, this time by way of Marseilles in 1789, it reached London in 1795, and in Curtiss Botanical Magazine for 1796 we find a colored figure of Chrysanthemum Sinense (there described under the name C. Indicum), the result of the second advent. Phillips, in his Flora Historica, published in 1824, tells us that the new plant was sold at a high price soon after its introduction, but it was not until the beginning of the nineteenth century that it attracted attention as a florists flower. Then, says he, like the Eoses of China, Chrysanthemums soon escaped from the conservatories of the curious, and as rapidly spread themselves over every part of the island, filling the windows of the cottagers and the parterres of the opulent with their autumnal beauties, that now vie with the China Aster in variety of color glory. Among other peculiar modes of culture resorted to by Chinese gardeners in Chrysanthemum culture is the engrafting of cuttings on to a
