

Goheen Witch 7 - Daughter of the Moon

As war ravages their Kingdom, the Goheen Sisterhood decide whether to intervene. Book 7 of the Goheen Witch Series A fantasy copyright 2014 Trisha Miller, London, England Goheen Witch Book 7 Daughter of the Moon Katya seemed embarrassed by my question and sat by the fire, her face grave and serious. It pained me to hear her, but I desired much to know how my love fared and sat silently, listening as her words gnawed and tore at my heart. Spring came early to the kingdom, not with warm sunlight and flower blossom but with fire and blood. An unaccustomed thaw had melted the snow into icy torrents and turned the high passes from an impassable barrier to an easy ride. The horse tribes came upon us in the night. They took no prisoners, disregarded all covenants and treaties, observing no boundaries of custom or decency. Many died to the knife, bow, axe and sword. They carried the heads of our children as war trophies, held up on the points of long spears. People were burned alive in the night as they slept. Old and young, it made no difference, and their piteous cries still haunt my memories. The tribes observe no code of chivalry, if anything ever can be chivalrous in war. Their bows, of a strange design, outranged ours and their mounted archers fled swiftly before they were overrun and made a stand with a deadly rain of arrows, their points dipped in wolf-bane. Their foot-soldiers fought with spear and shield in close formation, rendering them impervious to our archers and their Skaag witches made our men weak, with hellish conjuring. We lost the best of our warriors to them and the green fields of our fair land are soaked with blood. The flower of our youth has fallen, with few left to weep for them. And my Lord? I asked. He still lives, my Lady, but I fear not for long: he rides to challenge their Clan leader in battle, to attempt to stop the slaughter: trial by combat is the one law they still uphold. He will fall, and never see the hand that held the blade. The Skaag crones will ensure of that and all of Gandria will be theirs, I volunteered. I spoke true, but as the words as came forth from my mouth, I hated myself for saying them. The old Goheen crone stepped forward, may I be so bold as to offer some advice, Lady Taymar? If you must. As has ever been our custom, we cannot interfere in the world of men. You cannot leave this hidden kingdom. Yet I fear for your safety: you are heavy with child and I fear this place will prove a deadly trap for us all: It is undefended and its fields will become a killing ground, should our location be discovered. All this I already know, yet I fear for my child if we engage with the Skaag: they conjure death. If your Lord falls, my Lady, it will be only a matter of time till death comes to us all. Evil prevails. Engage them we must.
